DAWN Dinner

THE whisper of distant engines deepened to a full-throated roar and then, one after another, the powerful planes of the famous Blackhawks swept down out of the sunset and taxied up to the castle at the end of the airstrip. All around, the wild mountain country lay tangled and mysterious under the setting sun. Only here, where wealth and daring had built a luxurious headquarters in the wilderness, were there lights and life.

In the great baronial hall of the castle, Baron Wendorff turned from the window, grinning. "They have come as I predicted—Blackhawk and his crew to attend my testimonial dinner. They think I wish to honor them for smashing the San Goval uprising. Little they guess that I plotted that uprising and now, I have planned their destruction."

"Blackhawk and his men," announced the footman, and the blue-clad figures of the world's most famous fighting team strode into the hall.

"Good evening, Baron," Blackhawk smiled, taking the extended hand. "It was good of you to invite us here for this dinner. We don't normally accept honors but my men needed a bit of diversion so I felt an evening here would send us back to our job, refreshed."

"The honor is mine," gushed Baron Wendorff. "You have met my staff of advisors. Come right along. The table is set and dinner waits only your presence."

"My mouth waters already," Blackhawk smiled. "You know my men, I presume. This is Andre and the big fellow is Olaf. Over here are Stanislaus, Chuck and Hendrickson. And little Chop Chop, of course."

"Delighted," bowed the richly-clad group. The Baron led the way to the great table, groaning with its burden of rich food and rare wines. "Your places are all marked, gentlemen. I thought it would help us grow more intimate if each of you sat next to one of us. Thus we could converse more easily."

"Splendid," Blackhawk agreed. But as the men found their places, Chop Chop suddenly emitted a howl. "Is tleason! Is tellible mistakes. No place at table fo' little Chop Chop."

"I'm frightfully sorry," the Baron apologized. "I took it for granted your Chinese boy would eat with my servants. However . . ."

"Of course," Blackhawk said. He turned sharply. "Chop Chop, go to the kitchen at once. Let's hear no more of this."

"I won't!" Chop Chop yelled, dancing with rage and shaking his fists. "Chop Chop is legular Blackhawk, too. Not eat in kitchen . . ."

Still squawling and fighting, he vanished into the kitchen as Blackhawk sternly dragged him from sight.

Blackhawk came back in a moment, straightening his costume. "I apologize, gentlemen. Chop Chop is overly emotional."

"Forget it," beamed the Baron. He lifted his wine glass. "First, a toast to freedom, gentlemen. Drink it down."

All stood and drained their glasses. As they sat down, the Baron's smile twisted into a grimace of evil. "Now, my Blackhawk friends, how do you feel? That wine was heavily drugged. Even now your muscles refuse to respond to your will. In a moment you will be helpless. My seating arrangement makes it simple for my men to finish you off with their knives. The world will be rid of your stupid meddling and my plans will go on to complete triumph."

"Very interesting, Baron," Blackhawk said quietly. "But aren't you thinking of your own muscles? I see your head sagging and your eyes glazing. We knew you were behind that San Goval revolt and we have waited a long time to get you. It was easy to see through your trap when you sent that dinner invitation. That's why Chop Chop staged his little scene to divert your attention while my Blackhawks exchanged wine glasses with you and your men."

"Mais oui," said Andre sadly, then. "All ze fine speech and zese cochons can no longer hear eet. Zey have all gone to sleep."

"Ja," grumbled Hendrickson. "But before we haul dem off to jail, I move we eat dis fine food. I am starving."

"Py yiminy," said Olaf happily. "Das is vun t'ing about dese silly traps de set for us—it iss so much fun to steal da bait."
